A mathematical model of the regulation of reproduction in the pike Esox lucius. In order to analyze the evolution of the structures and functions associated with reproductive activity in fish, a quantitative mathematical model of reproduction in pikes (Esox lucius) was developed. The model describes the structure of the fish as a typical vertebrate and treats the most important internal and external environmental factors that affect the regulation of the gonadal function. The model consists of a dynamic model of the brain that provides a mathematical description of reproductive functions, and a set of differential equations describing the temporal dynamics of the gonads and systemic hormones. This mathematical model provides a thorough description of the reproductive cycle and reproduction. It has been used to predict the periods of vitellogenesis and spawning in pikes exposed to different environmental conditions, using published data on fish behavior and daily metabolic rates. The model is capable of simulating the effects of environmental changes at the individual level of fish reproduction, and its validation through experimentation is an important step in the development of a predictive and realistic model of fish
