History and profile The Spectator was founded in 1828. During the Second World War, the magazine was suppressed under the wartime regulations of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act 1939. In November 2010, management imposed a paywall on its website and charged readers to access content. In February 2011, publisher Condé Nast sold the magazine to the US-based Bauer Media Group, and the online paywall was lifted. In April 2015, Bauer increased the print edition's circulation from 150,000 to 300,000, to make it again among the top ten UK weekly news magazines, but reduced the number of copies published from 481,000 to 368,000, cutting the weekly income from £4.5 million to £3.7 million, at a time when the company was undergoing cost-cutting, job cuts and the closure of its Time Out magazine titles. The Spectator is a "big tent" publication, which, in accordance with its tradition, seeks to attract all views to the conservative side of the political spectrum. In addition to the full-page political cartoons, it includes serious commentary and a range of articles. The magazine concentrates on the Conservative Party and British politics, but also includes a range of opinion pieces on other issues, which may or may not be directly related to politics. According to analysis of the British Social Attitudes Survey, the readers of The Spectator are over-represented among upper-class and politically conservative Britons. It was rated first in the news magazine category in the 2008 National Magazine Awards. In June 2015 the magazine hit the headlines for the comments made by the editor,

Right now, the 2020 presidential election is a referendum on the state of the Democratic Party, and with its primary victory last week, the party is unifying under a candidate who is more moderate than progressive and more moderate than not progressive, and far more moderate than the far-left voters who are the primary supporters of Bernie Sanders. Bernie Sanders and his die-hard supporters want revolution, and the Democratic Party and its centrists aren't keen on that, and it's creating a lot of discord among Democratic voters. A similar dynamic was at play in 2016, with the contest between Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders. Many of Sanders' supporters were apoplectic that Clinton did not endorse him in the general election. Even though Clinton and Sanders had similar voting records, Sanders supporters saw Clinton as much more in line with their "ideological" position on issues like taxes and Wall Street regulation. That disaffection with the Democratic Party created a new party for Sanders, one that largely shied away from liberal economic policies and instead used the 2016 election as a platform to promote his socialist agenda. Sanders supporters were so eager to push the party further left that they ignored the fact that Clinton and her campaign did many of the same things that he did, like supporting trade deals that benefited Wall Street, her tacit support for fracking, and, of course, her hawkish foreign policy. Clinton received the Democratic Party's nomination, but many in the party felt that Sanders had gotten a raw deal. It's now 2020, and the tables have turned. The more moderate Clinton is more palatable to a wide swath of voters, and her win last week has removed a major obstacle for the party. "Sanders' supporters, who helped propel Clinton to victory, are likely to stay on the sidelines in 2020, and many will probably sit on the sidelines until a candidate who shares their views is nominated. ♦
