I am not "classy": a qualitative study of nursing students' pre-licensure education experiences and understanding of professionalism. This qualitative study was undertaken to better understand how nursing students understand and practice professionalism and to identify factors associated with professionalism in nursing students. An inductive design was used, including individual, focus group, and class interviews with nursing students. Participants' attitudes and behaviors were explored by eliciting their responses to questions about their understanding of and attitudes toward professionalism. Pre-licensure nursing students were found to have a positive and flexible understanding of professionalism. Participants expressed concern about the clinical environment and the needs of patients and identified specific problems that they perceived interfere with professionalism. In spite of their concern for their patients' needs, they did not perceive that they had a positive impact on the interaction between themselves and patients. This study highlights the influence of the clinical environment on professionalism and reinforces the importance of the educational process in transforming students' beliefs about professionalism.
