Hemolytic uremic syndrome (HUS) has been recognized as a frequent cause of acute renal failure in children for decades and should be one of the foremost causes to consider in the acute care setting.

HUS can be classified as either diarrhea-associated HUS, or typical or atypical HUS. In older children, it is more common that HUS is associated with antecedent diarrhea while in infants, HUS can be the first manifestation of an underlying disease, the most common being enteropathy associated with Escherichia coli infection. Infectious organisms that have been noted to trigger HUS include Shigella, Salmonella, Campylobacter, Yersinia, and Staphylococcus aureus. Besides, HUS has been associated with all autoantibodies, especially antiendothelial cell antibodies, and it can also be triggered by various drugs. Renal biopsies in children with HUS show a characteristic glomerular thrombotic microangiopathy that consists of focal or global obliterative thrombi within capillary tufts, which can be focal or "woven." In contrast, in adults renal biopsies show thrombi in tubular capillaries which can be of both glomerular or vascular origin. Immunoglobulins are known to play a role in HUS since antiendothelial cell antibodies are directed against a specific epitope of the platelet endothelial cell adhesion molecule (CD36) whose expression is upregulated by those antibodies. There is evidence that membrane-bound complement receptors, such as CD55 and CD59, and the soluble form of CD59 are important for the cytoprotection of renal glomerular microvascular endothelial cells from complement-induced injury. Those receptors seem to protect the kidney from the effects of circulating complement-mediated thrombotic injury. List of Zimbabwean musicians This is a list of musicians from Zimbabwe.
