Experimental models of viremia and endotheliitis in mice infected with Japanese encephalitis virus. To establish mouse models of viremia and endotheliitis. Female C57BL/6 mice were used to establish chronic infection with Japanese encephalitis virus (JEV). By prolonged exposure, natural infection with JEV was established to yield persistent viremia. Bone marrow microvascular endothelial cells (BMEC) were exposed in vitro to JEV and in vivo to JEV infection. In both models, positive results were shown by virus isolation from different tissues and tissues lesions. JEV induced viremia in mice in vivo and endotheliitis in vitro. A mouse model of JEV-induced viremia was established and proved to be useful in vaccine development.

1. Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to bonding an integrated circuit onto a substrate and more particularly to bonding a semiconductor die to a substrate having a material at the interface that is incompatible with the die.
2. Description of the Background Art Microelectronic devices, such as semiconductor chips, are typically encapsulated in a protective covering. For integrated circuits, one or more semiconductor chips are typically packaged to form an integrated circuit (IC) package. One or more IC packages are then typically encapsulated in a plastic material to form an IC package module. An IC package module typically includes a substrate in which electrical connections are formed and an encapsulant surrounding the IC package or IC packages. For example, a Ball Grid Array (BGA) includes an array of solder balls that is attached to a printed circuit board (PCB) by an underfilling material. In another example, a Land Grid Array (LGA) includes an array of solder pillars that is attached to a PCB by an underfilling material. Semiconductor die generally have one or more bond pads at the active surface that are used to connect the semiconductor die to another device or conductors on a printed circuit board. For example, integrated circuit dice are typically bonded to substrate to form packages using conductive epoxy or solder bumps that contact the die bond pads and substrate bond pads. Alternatively, an array of conduct

The dimming effects, the sound, and especially the screen savers' realistic sky can not be described. The program has two options for setting the time, hour, minute and a second (which you have to choose again for each interval change). You will be surprised. Very good in function, suitable for both work or play. If you want a very subtle screensaver, no bells and whistles, then this is a winner. I find this screensaver to be quite odd, as it is not just displaying the clouds, but a close up of clouds and of a barometric sky, not flashing, but dimming the computer, like a waterfall/drip. Flaw: What is not logical is that the wind blows the snow and the clouds along with it. It gets heavy in the snow areas, so it moves along with the wind that created it. I was getting a good laugh by watching it, but others would find it laughable, or it would blow their minds out.
