Local area networks (LANs) are connected networks of a relatively small area, typically a house, apartment building, or other premises. As used herein, the term “local area network” (LAN) refers to any network of a relatively small area, including but not limited to a group of devices connected with a common communications medium (e.g., a coaxial cable, twisted pair, a fiber-optic cable, etc.). A LAN may also be referred to herein as a LAN system, a LAN-based system, a wireless LAN system, a wireless LAN, or simply as a wireless network. A LAN may include computer systems, computer-related devices, and other devices that communicate with one another using network connections. The devices of a LAN typically communicate by transmitting and receiving electrical, electromagnetic, or optical impulses (or other forms of electrical, electromagnetic, or optical signals) across the communications medium of the LAN. LANs often use “wired” communications networks for transmitting signals, and the communications medium may be, for example, Ethernet cables, coaxial cables, twisted pair cables, fiber-optic cables, power lines, telephone lines, radio-frequency (RF) or infrared (IR) transmission lines, or some combination of the above communications media. The term “highway” may refer to a combination of a large number of LANs and communications mediums. Wired communications networks typically have many problems with respect to the dynamic nature of wireless communications networks. As used herein, the term “wireless communications network” refers to a network of a relatively large area, including but not limited to a building, an office complex, a campus, a campus network, a community, a rural area, a campus wireless network, a hotel, a store, a home, a home network, a shopping mall, a parking lot, a hospital, a school, a restaurant, a store, a restaurant, a building, a transit network, a bus, a train, a train network, a transit network, an airport, an airport network, or a university. A wireless communications network may use one of several protocols to transmit and receive signals. The term “signal” is used herein to refer to any form of electrical, electromagnetic, optical, or any other form of impulse-like waveform. The term “communications medium” or “communications medium” as used herein refers to the transmission medium upon which the signals may be transmitted. For example,
