From what I understand, containers and processes don't have to compromise security on their own. Containers are mounted on top of the kernel of the "host" and the "host" just "hosts" the containers. So does that mean Docker containers are more secure than non-Docker containers on the same physical machine? Or is this more of a VM container thing? What kind of threats do containers face? A: From what I understand, containers and processes don't have to compromise security on their own. Containers are mounted on top of the kernel of the "host" and the "host" just "hosts" the containers. Containers are not mounted on the host's kernel. Containers are virtualized (virtualized is a bit of a simplification, but lets get on with it). If the host is Kernel-level Virtualization then that means the hypervisor (the kernel of 82138339de
