On the recognition of foreign bodies. During the period 1986-90, at the Department of Otorhinolaryngology, University Hospital in Gdańsk, a total of 95 foreign bodies were extracted from the human head and neck. The vast majority (90.5%) of these foreign bodies was of a relatively simple type and made of a metallic material. The aim of this paper is to assess the importance of the adhesive properties of a foreign body as a factor affecting the process of its recognition by the patient or by medical personnel and to present the parameters in favour of or against the adhesive properties of a foreign body. A foreign body is considered to be potentially adhesive if the surface of the foreign body has reduced friction. The type of foreign body, if it is made of one material, and the shape, size, location and depth of the foreign body, if it is made of more than one material, must all be taken into account when the characteristics of the foreign body are assessed. Dental prosthesis were analysed in the most detail. The characteristics of the dental prosthesis showed the most pronounced influence on the degree of adhesion. However, the dentist, when he is placing a dental prosthesis in the patient's mouth, is also assessing and taking into account the conditions of the patient's mouth. In situations when the dentist cannot be sure of the adhesive properties of the dental prosthesis, the doctor treating the patient should assess all the relevant parameters of the patient's health, knowledge of the foreign body in question and the patient's ability to recognise the foreign body.The effects of race, country of residence, socio-economic status, and gender on skin ageing. This study examines the multidimensional effects of demographic factors on the development of skin aging by performing a direct comparison of data on skin aging from the United States and England. The study provides evidence for the importance of demographic factors, such as race, socio-economic status, and country of residence, on the amount and distribution of skin aging. The rate of aging of the skin varied significantly between different age groups and ethnic and racial groups in both countries. Skin aging was also found to vary by gender in both countries. In addition, the rate of skin aging varied by socio-economic status in England, but not in the United States. This study also provides evidence for the inappropriateness of the use of the 'chronological' aging paradigm as a way of thinking about aging. The results show that chronological age is an inaccurate predictor of skin aging
